Already Have an Estate Plan?

Don't Make These 5 Mistakes

Many people believe that once they have an estate plan in place, they're finished. They've signed the documents, organized their affairs, and feel confident that everything is taken care of … but wait, there's more!

We often see the same mistakes come up again and again. Usually, the issue isn't that someone failed to plan. It's that the plan they created years ago may no longer reflect their current circumstances, family dynamics, or financial situation.

Estate planning is not something you create once and forget about. As life changes, your estate plan may need to change with it. Here are five estate planning mistakes we see most often, along with considerations to ensure your plan continues to accomplish what you intended.

Choosing the Wrong Fiduciary

One of the most common mistakes we see is choosing the wrong fiduciary. It's not necessarily the oldest child, and it may not be all of your children together. You really have to think about family dynamics and whether the person you are naming has the skill set and time required to handle the responsibility.

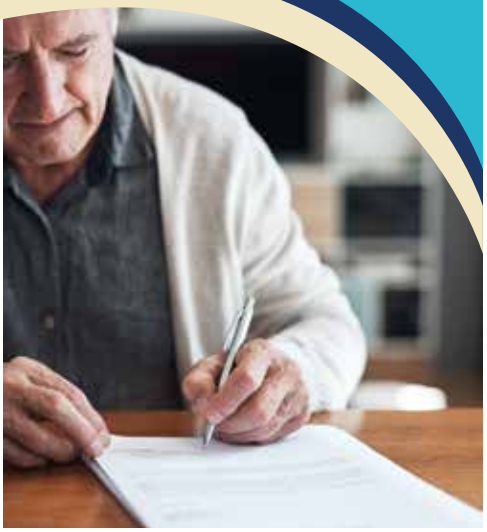
A fiduciary may need to manage complex decisions, communicate with beneficiaries, and handle important financial matters. Choosing someone simply because they are family does not always mean they are the right person for the role.

It is also important to revisit these decisions over time. The people included in your plan 10 years ago may no longer be appropriate today. Their circumstances may have changed, or they may no longer have the availability or skills needed.

Forgetting About Your Digital Assets

Another mistake is failing to consider your digital assets. Many people don't realize how complicated online accounts can become after someone passes away. This goes beyond giving someone your password. Increasingly, companies are sending verification codes to a person's cellphone, and if you cannot access that phone, you may not be able to manage those accounts.

Making sure you have named the appropriate "legacy contacts" on each digital platform, is crucial.



Not Keeping Your Trust Properly Funded

A trust only applies to assets actually titled in the name of the trust. Creating and signing a trust is an important step, but you also need to ensure it is properly funded.

Have you opened new accounts since creating your trust? Did you purchase a new property? Do you have real estate in another state that needs coordination?

Without proper funding, your trust may not provide the protection and benefits you intended.

Having an Outdated Estate Plan

A plan that was great under the laws from 15 or 20 years ago may not work the same way today. Changes in the law or your financial situation can create unintended consequences, including potential tax issues for beneficiaries.

Reviewing your estate plan regularly helps ensure it still reflects your goals and current circumstances.

A House Isn't Always a Gift

Protecting Loved Ones From an Inheritance Headache

Owning a home is a common dream of many adults, and inheriting property from a loved one can feel like a life-changing gift. Though you may have the best intentions in leaving your home to a child or another heir in your estate plan, not everyone stops to consider what financial responsibilities come with that.

From taxes and insurance to maintenance costs and legal fees, the property's true cost could exceed expectations. Thoughtful estate planning that considers these potential burdens is one of the best ways to ensure a dream home does not become a nightmare for your loved one after you are gone.

The Price Tag of Homeownership

Homeownership comes with significant financial responsibilities. If your intended heir has only ever rented, inheriting a house may be their first experience managing all the expenses that come with owning property. Once the home transfers to them, they'll be responsible for ongoing costs, including electricity, gas, water, and other utilities, as well as all other expenses associated with maintaining the property. Unlike renting, if something goes wrong, like a leaky roof or broken AC, they are responsible for the repairs, as well as regular maintenance of the property.

There are also recurring costs like property taxes, which will continue throughout your heir's life in the home. Sometimes, when your home is reassessed at its current market value after your passing, the bill can increase significantly. Homeowner's insurance premiums can also increase once your child or another heir takes over the policy.

If your home has a mortgage, that debt doesn't go away. Your heir will have options, such as assuming the mortgage and continuing to make payments, but this depends on the loan. There are cases where they may have to pay the loan off or refinance it. Your heir can sell the home and use the proceeds to pay off the mortgage, but there could be serious tax consequences.

Estate Plan Expenses

Having a proper estate plan in place can make the transfer of property to your loved one smoother, but if not done thoughtfully, it can incur its own costs. If the property goes through probate or is held in a trust, the bills still have to get paid. An executor will often use funds from the estate to cover probate or trust expenses, but if it isn't enough, they may need to sell or liquidate assets. One of the best strategies is to include funds in your plan specifically to cover these expenses as your heirs decide what's next.

Passing Down a Home

A home could still be a life-changing gift for your loved ones if you plan it carefully and have open discussions with your family about the process. One option is a trust with a right of occupancy, which allows someone to live in the home, with clear rules specifying who is responsible for expenses. A transfer-on-death deed passes the home on automatically to your beneficiary when you pass away, but it's not available in every state. While this helps avoid probate, your heir will still inherit the mortgage, tax liens, and any HOA fees. You could also leave the property to surviving joint co-owners with equal interests, but this could trigger gift tax or expose the estate to creditors.

Your home may be the most valuable thing you own, and it's natural to want to give that to your children or your loved ones. Just be clear with them about what this inheritance entails, and work with an experienced estate planning attorney to develop the best strategies.

Failing to Update Dollar Amounts or Percentages

Another mistake we see is having numbers or percentages in a plan that no longer make sense as an estate value changes.

For example, someone may have left a $200,000 gift to a friend or family member. But if the estate has decreased due to long-term care costs or other expenses, that fixed-dollar gift may affect what primary beneficiaries receive.

It may be worth reconsidering whether those gifts should be structured differently, such as using the lesser of a specific dollar amount or a percentage of the estate so the overall plan continues to work as intended.

POCKET-SIZE PREHISTORY

The Real-Life Hobbits of Flores

Long before Frodo was having second breakfast in the Shire, real-life "hobbits" were leaving footprints on human history. Homo floresiensis was one of the last surviving humans, alongside our own species, Homo sapiens. Standing a little over 3 feet tall, these petite people got by on their home island by hunting and gathering with advanced tools. Their small skeletons were discovered in 2003 in a remote cave, but much of their story remains a mystery.

A Stunning Surprise

When an Indonesian-Australian research team explored the Liang Bua cave on the island of Flores, Indonesia, they discovered the remains of a miniature human-like creature. At first, they estimated these beings lived out their lives 12,000–74,000 years ago. As scientists have learned more about them, it is clear that the remains are older, dating back between 60,000 and 100,000 years. In total, they have found the partial skeleton of a female and fragments of at least 13 other hobbits.

Small Survivors

Along with their height, Homo floresiensis had particularly short legs compared to their longer arms and large feet. Tools found with their fossils suggest they hunted Komodo dragons, giant rats, and other small mammals. Due to the wear on their teeth, researchers think they ate plenty of nutritious plants that required a lot of chewing. Without any signs of burials or other ceremonies, it's difficult to say what their culture was like.

Mini Mysteries

So, where exactly did this teeny tribe come from? It's still a mini mystery! Early theories speculated that they evolved from another ancient human species that shrank over time after arriving on Flores due to island dwarfism. With limited resources, their bodies grew smaller. In 2016, the theory that they were from another human species gained traction.

Jaw bones discovered just outside the cave are even smaller and older. They likely traveled from Africa to the island, a long journey they couldn't have swum, so it's possible they were swept up in a tsunami before settling on the island.

While they may have been small in stature, the hobbit people left behind oversized questions about our past. Unlike the characters many of us imagine in a fictional world, these tiny humans are grounded in science, not Middle-earth.

Meet Humanity's Little Cousins

4 Meet the Orphaned Calf Who Found Love After Loss

From Heartbreak to Hippo Hugs

The Baby Hippo Who Fell Asleep in His Rescuer's Arms

Hippos might not be known for cuddles and taking dips in private pools, but Bumpy isn't your average animal. Today, the tiny hippo calf is living the good life at the Sheldrick Wildlife Trust in Kenya, but his story started with heartbreak. He was discovered orphaned, lying next to his mother's lifeless body, alone in the wilderness. Thanks to the loving care of his rescuers, he's getting a fresh start.

Bumpy was discovered at Oloiden Resort in Naivasha, Kenya, this May, after the Kenya Wildlife Service received multiple reports of a calf calling for help in the park. The team of animal advocates who went to help him found Bumpy nudging his dead mother, hoping she would wake up. Because hippos commonly get into territorial fights, especially when babies are involved, they believe she perished protecting him from danger.

The little calf had to take a long ride after his traumatic ordeal to reach the Sheldrick Wildlife Trust's Nairobi Nursery. But once he arrived, he was treated to warm milk and a comfy red blanket, finally falling asleep in the arms of a caretaker.

While hippos are social, they are one of Africa's most dangerous animals. They are responsible for an estimated 500 human deaths across the continent each year. Bumpy, however, quickly bonded with his rescuers and even sat in a caretaker's lap as they flew him to another facility.

"He is a very snuggly creature and is happiest when nestled on or against someone," said the organization.

Since arriving at his new home, he's been healthy and has received around-the-clock care to ensure his rehabilitation goes smoothly. When he's not cozying up to a staffer, he spends most of his days swimming in his pool and taking long snoozes on a mattress.

Young hippos stay with their mothers for years in the wild. They're dependent on them for protection, milk, and lessons in survival. Early separations like Bumpy's can be particularly difficult, but the rescue organization is hopeful that it can release him back into the wild once he's older.

Until then, this once orphaned baby is going to get in every snuggle and treat he can.
